D. Perraton,1983 This set of papers addresses a single theme the effectiveness of traditional methods of agricultural extension and basic education and the value of alternative approaches using the mass media The research has found i that farmers educational level is positively and significantly related to farm management but the relationship between extension services and farm management is unclear and ii radio can be a cost effective way of providing or supporting formal education Two papers review the literature on the subject and three case studies follow The papers conclude that although the evidence on extension services and on the use of mass media is mixed there is a case for expanding and improving the use of mass media both as a support to extension services and as a way of reaching farmers including women farmers Further research into the modalities of using mass media the best ways of combining media and the linking of mass media with extension services is recommended Rural Extension Services Jock R. Anderson,Gershon Feder,2003 Anderson and Feder analyze the considerations that lead policymakers to undertake extension investments as a key public responsibility as well as the complex set of factors and intra agency incentives that explain why different extension systems performance vary The authors provide a conceptual framework outlining farmers demand for information the welfare economic characterizations of extension services and the organizational and political attributes that govern the performance of extension systems They use the conceptual framework to examine several extension modalities and to analyze their likely and actual effectiveness Specifically the modalities reviewed include training and visit extension decentralized systems fee for service and privatized extension and farmer field schools The authors also discuss methodological issues pertaining to the assessment of extension outcomes and review the empirical literature on extension impact They emphasize the efficiency gains that can come from locally decentralized delivery systems with incentive structures based largely on private provision that in most poorer countries is still publicly funded In wealthier countries and for particular higher income farmer groups extension systems will likely evolve into fee for service organizations This paper a joint product of the Agriculture and Rural Development Department and Rural Development Development Research Group is part of a larger effort in the Bank to study the opportunities and challenges facing agricultural extension Index to International Statistics ,1989 Abstracts on Rural Development in the Tropics ,1988 Concepts and Practices in Agricultural Extension in Developing Countries ,2008-01-01 Dairy Development In India: An Appraisal Of Challenges And Achievements V.
