This authors' goal is to provide a conceptual framework for developing a therapeutic community which combines the understanding of motivation, self-control systems with structural, social and nursing care. It is their belief, namely, that they have not only provided these basic principles of understanding, understanding, communication, and family organization that they believe are necessary to a therapeutic community in the therapeutic. This book is a description of their experience at the Pillsbury Hospital and at several other mental care facilities throughout the

The ideas in this book have been adapted from the disciplines of psychology, sociology, anthropology and genetics, medicine, education, law, social science, family theory, group theory, and nursing care. These adaptations allow the use of new structural methods which have been adapted of human concepts previously believed to be inherently unchangeable. The authors feel that these methods could be adapted to other areas of the hospital and facilities of nursing homes, leading to better patient care.
