FAO Emergency Centre for Locust Operations

No. 315

(4 January 2005)

General Situation during December 2004 Forecast until mid-February 2005

The Desert Locust situation remained serious during December in the Western Region where intensive control operations continued against immature swarms in Morocco, Algeria and Mauritania. Nevertheless, the scale of these operations declined during the month. In West Africa, some swarms moved along the Southern Circuit migration route and invaded Gambia, southern Senegal and Guinea Bissau. A few swarms may have also reached Guinea. Most of the current locust populations are likely to remain immature except in northwest Mauritania where limited breeding could occur. In the Central Region, winter breeding commenced at the end of the month on the Red Sea coast in northeast Sudan and southeast Egypt where hatching and band formation are likely to take place in the coming weeks.

Western Region. Numerous immature swarms were present in and near the Atlas Mountains in Morocco and Algeria during December. Other swarms were scattered throughout the northern and central Sahara in Algeria and in western Libya. A few swarms were reported along the Mediterranean coast near Tripoli. In West Africa, a substantial number of small immature swarms were moving about in southern and central Mauritania. Late forming swarms from summer breeding in the Sahel reinvaded parts of southeastern Mauritania and eastern Senegal. Some of these swarms continued south along the Southern Circuit into Gambia and southern Senegal, reaching central Guinea Bissau by the end of the month and perhaps northern Guinea. These swarms are likely to remain immature and persist in southern Senegal and Guinea. Aerial and ground control operations treated about 880,000 ha in the region during December, compared to 2.2 million in the previous month.

Central Region. There were numerous reports of immature adult groups and swarms in northern Egypt as well as in the Western Desert and the Sinai Peninsula during December. Some of the adults reached the winter breeding areas along the coastal plains Red Sea in southern Egypt where a few had become mature and were breeding. In adjacent areas of northeast Sudan, two swarms laid eggs at the end of the month. Small immature adult groups were present on the northern Red Sea coast in Saudi Arabia, and scattered adults were seen on the Red Sea coastal plains near Tokar Delta, Sudan. Other scattered adults of local origin were present on the Red Sea coast in Yemen. Local breeding was in progress in northwest Somalia. During the forecast period, hatching and the formation of small hopper groups and bands are expected to occur in some places along the Red Sea Trench.

Eastern Region. No locusts were reported during December in the Region, and no significant developments are likely.
