The Anthropology of Language 3rd edition
Instructor's Manual
Chapter 6 – Language in Action

Chapter Summary

This chapter demonstrates that learning a language is more complex than merely learning sounds and forming grammatically correct sentences. It discusses the importance of learning how the language is used in real situations, by real people, and of learning how those people think about the ways that language can and should be used (in other words, of learning something about linguistic ideology). Students will learn how social and cultural contexts can affect ideas about who should speak, when they should speak, and how they should speak, as well as who should listen, and why they should listen. Linguistic competence (knowing how to form grammatically correct sentences) is introduced and contrasted with communicative competence (knowing how to get the floor and speak appropriately in real situations, so that people will listen to one's words). The chapter reminds students that a goal of linguistic anthropology is to describe and analyze communicative competence in different cultures and languages.

The chapter introduces Malinowski's early work describing the contexts of language use and explains how Hymes and others built on Malinowski's work to develop the ethnography of speaking as a research framework in the 1960s for describing language in social and cultural contexts. The S-P-E-A-K-I-N-G acronym (setting/scene, participants, ends, act sequences, keys, instrumentalities, norms, and genres) is introduced and described in detail, along with examples that are accessible and
