

ascend all the way up to the crowning pinnacle, the tower. This gives the castle a certain touch of elegance.

Apart from the basement and the large hall on the first attic floor (which looks extremely complicated, but is in fact simply based on Gaudí's principle of carrying arches), this castle-structure which looks so heavily-set from the outside holds all the elegance of the most beautiful Art Nouveau villa in the world. The white, almost undulating plaster walls and pillars, which often branch out at odd angles, seemingly leading into other areas and rooms, virtually soak up the light, intensify it, pass it on; light and shadow enter into ornamental interplay. One's view does not come to rest anywhere, it is forever moved on to something else. This brings us to the

The octagonal corner pillar in the centre of the glass window is intended to allude to Minotaur, the godhead of love.
