Clark, 1995 A potential hydrologic effect of surface mining of coal in southeastern Montana is a change in the quality of ground water Dissolved solids concentrations in water in spoils aquifers generally are larger than concentrations in water in the coal aquifers they replaced however laboratory experiments have indicated that concentrations can decrease if ground water flows from coal mine spoils to coal This study was conducted to determine if decreases in concentrations occur onsite and if so which geochemical processes caused the decreases Solid phase core samples of spoils unmined over burden and coal and ground water samples were collected from 16 observation wells at two mine areas In the Big Sky Mine area changes in ground water chemistry along a flow path from an upgradient coal aquifer to a spoils aquifer probably were a result of dedolomitization Dissolved solids concentrations were unchanged as water flowed from a spoils aquifer to a downgradient coal aquifer In the West Decker Mine area dissolved solids concentrations apparently decreased from about 4 100 to 2 100 milligrams per liter as water moved along an inferred flow path from a spoils aquifer to a downgradient coal aquifer Geochemical models were used to analyze changes in water chemistry on the basis of results of solid phase and aqueous geochemical characteristics Geochemical processes postulated to result in the apparent decrease in dissolved solids concentrations along this inferred flow path include bacterial reduction of sulfate reverse cation exchange within the coal and precipitation of carbonate and iron sulfide minerals Proceedings of the Technology and the Mine Problem Symposium Albert M.
