

is the product of the workshop. Because the study of the toxicity of mixtures is relatively new, the Subcommittee on Mixtures, which prepared the report, confined its considerations to a small number of issues.

APPROACHES FOR PROBLEM RESOLUTION

Several possibilities exist for attacking the problems of testing (and regulating) mixtures. Research on mechanisms could lead to theoretical modeling that would exploit data on the toxicity of single materials; that is a desirable long-term goal. In the absence of knowledge of mechanisms and of accepted models for combining the toxicities of single materials, some mixtures will have to be tested. If the numbers of such mixtures can be kept small, testing might become both operationally and economically possible.

GROUPING CHEMICALS FOR ESTIMATION OF COMBINED RISK

A prudent first step in assessing and managing the health risks associated with exposure to mixtures in drinking water is to reduce the apparent number of mixtures by developing appropriate methods for grouping the substances found in water. This report examines two such groups based on similarities of biologic effects: volatile organic chemicals (VOCs), of which several are suspected human carcinogens, and organophosphorus compounds and carbamates, which inhibit acetylcholinesterase. In addition, this report suggests some ways to make other logical classifications and thus reduce the testing needed.

Except for the trihalomethanes (a class of volatile organic chemicals that are by-products of disinfection), the EPA Office of Drinking Water has promulgated standards only for single components of drinking water. It is unlikely that each agent present in drinking water will act in biologic isolation of every other agent present. Where the mechanisms of toxicity of two or more toxicants are the same or similar, exposure to several materials, each at a below-threshold dose (i.e., a dose with a zero response), could amount to exposure to an above-threshold dose and produce a response.

EPA's general guidelines for evaluating the health risk associated with exposure to a chemical mixture recommend that, if data are not available on the complete mixture or a toxicologically similar mixture, a dose-additive method be used to define a "hazard index" (in effect, an exposure index) based on measured concentrations and reference doses. The subcommittee recommends using a modified hazard index that sums similar toxicities, incorporates multiple toxic manifestations, and suggests, under some circumstances, the use of an uncertainty factor to allow for possible synergisms.

The subcommittee reviewed earlier schemes for the arbitrary grouping of substances in its efforts to devise some classification schemes that could
