Anxiety Disorders: Mental Illness or Normal Reaction to Life? Terry Dixon,2020-06-01 Generalized anxiety disorder OCD social phobia PTSD panic disorder severe depression Today cognitive thinking and behavioural problems involving high anxiety and fear are classed as anxiety disorders This is based on the medical model which views these problems as mental illnesses disorders where something goes wrong in the brain and the answer lies in fixing the thing that has gone wrong often with medication However Take the middle aged woman emotionally fragile from early life stress and conflict who suffers emotional abuse at the hands of her partner abuse that not only scares her but also makes her feel that she cannot do anything right and that everything she tries will fail miserably or is totally worthless Is her generalized anxiety disorder or severe depression for that matter simply the result of something going wrong in her brain that can be fixed by medication What about the man in his early twenties riddled with anxiety whose father constantly put him down and criticized him with such venom as a child that he s now petrified that others will do the same Is his social phobic behaviour truly dis ordered and irrational Or the teenage girl brought up by overly strict religious parents that have so drummed the fear of God into her that all she can do to obtain relief from punishment by the Lord is turn to rituals Are her obsessive fearful thoughts and compulsive behaviours really all down to mental illness Generalized anxiety disorder OCD social phobia PTSD panic disorder severe depression are any of these problems truly irrational disordered and mental illness
