This authors' goal is to provide a conceptual framework for developing a therapeutic community which includes the understanding of motivation, and further expands on institutional and nursing care. It is our hope that readers will find these and other practical ideas from principles of understanding, understanding, communication, and family organization that they believe are necessary to a therapeutic community in the therapeutic. This book is a continuation of their experience at the Pitts County Nursing Home as it evolved from institutional care to a therapeutic community.

The ideas in this book have been adapted from the disciplines of psychology, sociology, anthropology and genetics, including, particularly, the areas of family, family therapy, group therapy, and community care. These adaptations allow the use of new conceptual methods which have been adapted of human concepts previously believed to be exclusively anthropological. The authors feel that these methods could be adapted to other fields in the sciences and humanities of nursing, medicine, leading to better patient care.
