There have been arguments in favour of the use of a thinking position and a decision to stop thinking. Depending on the severity of the chosen initial response to a situation, thought alone may be sufficient to bring the body system to equilibrium in limited, physical situations (eg, the initial response to a fall). However, thought and perception have a role to play in a decision and subsequent action, sometimes providing a useful alternative to direct physical responses. Components of the decision-making process include: judgement, psychological reasoning, self-body image and controlling the body's reactions.
