Broadcast Blues Eric Burns, 1993 There have been memoirs by television anchorpeople before there have been intellectual critiques of the medium but there has never been a book like Broadcast Blues In this smart scathing and very funny account of his years on the air former NBC News correspondent Eric Burns exposes the distortions and pretensions of television journalism by showing us how it works how what we see on our screens gets there and freely confesses his role in all of it Broadcast Blues records the transformation of a TV obsessed teenager American Bandstand was my homework and I was the most diligent of students into an accomplished journalist with unique qualifications to skewer his profession Burns writes trenchantly of his rapid rise from WNOW TV in Parkersburg West Virginia America s 196th largest market where he fretted about his blinking rate overbite and general appearance so thin that when I wear a bow tie I look like a swizzle stick to his dream job as a correspondent for NBC News where his duties included being the next Charles Kuralt and substituting for the drugged out Jessica Savitch as anchor of NBC News Digest He paints a withering portrait of PBS thought by so many to be the medium s salvation and offers a hilariously revealing account of his stint on Entertainment Tonight prime organ of the celebrity culture As Samuel Johnson might have said when a man knows he is about to interview Molly Ringwald it concentrates his mind wonderfully He is equally perceptive about his own motives and powerfully describes the early life crisis that ultimately led him to see his journalistic self as a three card monte dealer simultaneously delighting and impoverishing the people at home by my clever shuffling of events Unlike other critics of television journalism Eric Burns addresses the issues with the lucidity and sophistication of an insider who made it to the top and walked away
