

Bismarck (1940)

Bismarck and Tirpitz represented the peak of German battleship design - in terms of size, armament, speed and staying-power. But Bismarck's first combat mission, though including a major success, was also its last.

While Adolf Hitler contemplated a war against Great Britain, he told his naval chiefs that it would not be until 1944-45, and when war actually broke out in September 1939 the Kriegsmarine had only two modern battleships plus four 'pocket battleships'. But two very large warships had been launched, and two even larger ones had just been set down (though their construction was abandoned at the end of 1942).

Bismarck was laid down at Blohm & Voß, Hamburg, on July 1, 1939, launched on February 16, 1940 and completed on August 24, 1940. Its cost was 190,000,000

Reichsmarks. The chief designer, Dr. Hermann Burchard, who was also responsible for Gneisenau and Scharnhorst, was no longer operating within constraints other than the essential considerations of balancing firepower, speed, protection and propulsion power. The main guns were eight 380mm (15in) mounted in twin turrets, arranged to keep the guns as far apart as possible to avoid shocks and interference.

Overall length was 2,167 and weight was 57.3 tonnes (127.5 tons). Range was 36,000m (39,588yd) at an elevation of 35 degrees (giving a low trajectory and shortening shot flight time). The ships weighed 7,000 (17,000) and were of three levels: armour plating 40 for use against battleships and two types of 40 steel, one with a fixed face and one with a loose face. Mainmast guns were fixed on Turrets - 12 140mm (5.5in) guns fitted in twin turrets, three on each side. AA defences consisted of 18 105mm (4.1in) anti-air guns, 16 88mm (3.5in) anti-air guns and 12 20mm (0.78in) single-barrel guns.

Gunnery control

Gunnery control was located in three positions, on the forward corning tower, above the firing platform and on the rear corning tower, with communication lines to two computer rooms, within the armoured zone fore and aft.

Unlike Tirpitz, Bismarck carried no torpedoes but both ships had four Arado Ar 190 fighters. The hull was constructed from ST52 steel and more than 50 per cent was of electric welding construction. Armour was of three kinds. Haupt-KGWA was hardened for the belt, turrets and conning towers. Vth - Wasser fest (Hard) - for the armoured decks, and Vth - Wasser schwach (Soft) - for the longitudinal torpedo bulkheads.

Armour displacement

Altogether the armour weight was 13,604 tonnes (17,206 tons), 32.2 per cent of total displacement. The hull was divided into 22 watertight compartments, 17 within the armoured zone, which accounted for 70 per cent of the

The cutaway plan gives some idea of the extent and subdivision of internal compartments within the hull. This arrangement was one of prime reasons for the ship's remarkable staying power in combat.

Radar equipment

Bismarck carried 1,000 radar equipment on the forward end of superstructure and the bridge, though later information revealed it was fitted with only one.

Searchlights

Seven 1,000,000 candlepower searchlights were carried, six on the forward and two on the aft.

Base anchors

Three large anchors were carried, two on the port side and one stern anchor (also port side). Each anchor weighed 20,000kg (44,000lb).

Base

After war experience with Gneisenau, Bismarck's base design was amended to 'Helm' form after building had almost completed.

Engines

Four shafts to propulsion - two diesel - two fuel oil. In a compact arrangement with towers on each side, geared to the shafts, and protected from the weather.

Main turrets

German practice was to name the main turrets - A, B, C, D - as they were, from bow to stern.
