

The Assistance

On the farm it never mattered; behind the barn, in any grass, against any convenient tree,

the woodshed in winter, in a corner if it came to that.

But in a city of eight million, one stands on the defensive.

In the West 39th St. parking lot it has long since sunk into the cinders.

But in the shallow doorway of a shop on Third Avenue, between the dusk and the streetlight, it was the trail of the likewise drinking-man who preceded me that gave me courage.
