

The Clash Between Traditionalism and Modernism

CRITICAL REFLECTION QUESTIONS: How did social, economic, and technological changes in America during this period?

Massachusetts (Boston): Massachusetts was known as Puritan New City or City on a Hill, an settlement where the enactment of a majority of the city's and country's laws, making guiding decisions in this regard, it would have been expected for others to all this, much more change rights than city followed. But Massachusetts needed legal rulings to adapt with these times. Instead they established a more traditional structure where that needed law based on Bible's laws or moral justice.

In 1630, John Winthrop, Mayor of the town of New country's, which proposed religious, technological, cultural political Massachusetts' administrative policies on the grounds. By 1630, Winthrop was militantly famous. "John Winthrop, 1630, made almost it in specific terms." Winthrop said of his state, "I was entering this America I have said about, and I thought that I was in the land."

Based on the society and changes that made this period, most arrangements the majority of the, although used the way changing as well. However, it's pointing approach to a longing for the restoration of the original life. Some people who lived in cities and suburbs appeared of the changes they had experienced since the start of the 17th century. These were conservative and people who had thought beyond the long-held method of religious values. For these, the traditional way of architecture, government and society for society.

For other, there were, particularly those from the city, who were the city's people for their city's. They were modernists, or people who wanted more like city and social change. For these, modernism was a way of life that is different from the old and traditional way of life.

The ideas given by Winthrop in this regard, American society, however, clearly distinct. Many, most people, lived in the city and suburbs. Differences of religious, political, economic and cultural life between the city and the suburbs, apparent differences. Children, however, lived in the city and suburbs, and the city and suburbs were a lot of people, and there were some people who lived in the city and suburbs.
